Gender-based violence prevention and response

The Anglican Inter Faith Network of the Anglican Communion remains small, but is fully committed to safeguarding of the vulnerability, of ensuring gender balance at all levels of its work, and in ending gender-based violence. This is particularly evident in the advocacy for including threat of gender violence as a mitigating circumstance for granting asylum in international law. As the work seeks to prevent incitement to atrocities, working with women at all levels of negotiation and delivery is among the essential elements in building strong communities, in preventing conflict and in any reconciliation efforts. Women are generally responsible for procuring and preparing food, and yet are most at risk in conflict. When they are at threat, so is the family. The network fully supports gender equality and responding strongly to threat of violence.

This includes its own institutions within the church, bowing to cultural pressure - as would be natural.
